ACCORDING TO HOYLE

MEANING OF THE PHRASE: In accord with the highest authority; in accord with a strict set of rules.

WHAT IS THE ORIGIN OF THE PHRASE: The life and views of the celebrated but controversial /English astronomer Sir Fred Hoyle has led many to suggest that this phrase refers to him.

In addition to his undoubted important contributions to scientific research, the plain-speaking Yorkshireman was very well known for espousing forthright opinions and didn't care much for any views to the contrary. His steadfast rejection of Darwinism and the opinion that human life originated in space didn't encourage his colleagues to flock to his side.

Although Fred Hoyle might be a plausible initial guess when tracing the origin of this phrase, the Hoyle in question here is Edmond Hoyle (1692 - 1769), the English barrister and writer who was the author of several works on card games. He was (and still is) cited as the final authority when disputes on the rules of the card games arose.

Hoyle's Short Treatise on the game of Whist included not only the rules, but gave insights into how to win at the game. In view of that it was sought after but, due to the high price of one guinea, many illegal copies circulated. Genuine copies bore the qualifying statement "No copies of this book are genuine but what are signed by Edmond Hoyle and Thomas Osborne". The esteem in which genuine "Hoyles" were held no doubt added to the book's reputation as being the only true source of definitive facts concerning the game. Hoyle wrote several other books on cards and other pastimes.

The earliest use of the phrase found in print is in The Town and Country Magazine, Volume 18, 1786.
